E-Health brings everyone working for you!

Electronic personal identifiers (EPI's), scheduled to be introduced into main stream healthcare early next year by the federal government, must allow team collaboration and consumer focus says general practitioner Dr Mukesh Haikerwal at the National Allied Health Conference being held today in Canberra.

With the release today by of the new E-health personal identifiers for citizens and registered health professionals, Allied Health Professions Australia proved the need for health care practice rather than the singular general practice to be the focus of the Australian health reform agenda.

Health care practice puts all providers together and united for the benefit of the consumers before health costs spiral. It ensures that consumers will get the right professional at the right time and in the right place. No longer can one practitioner own the whole problem.
